

Lecturing from the President Byeong in the light of Ministry, Philosophy, and Leadership of Dr. Melvin (Number 93)

Two forms of repetition

It's true that you have to repeat it to master anything. But some things you just have to repeat the same thing. For example, if you listen to an English sentence hundreds of times, you just memorize it. This is something you've done a lot when you were young. It's a simple form of memorizing, remembering. The other is to repeat it hundreds of times like spinning a wheel and making a circle because there are several themes when you work in a ministry. The image is of spinning a wheel by hand.

For example, let's say you spin a heavy metal wheel. At first, it's hard. But if you keep spinning it three or four times, it's hard for us to turn it by hand, and eventually it's hard to hold your hand as it automatically turns at a speed of 6-70 km/h, and from then on, it continues to rotate with so-called elasticity. It makes sense enough and must be true.

For example, according to Stanford University professor Jim Collins, several ministries should be implemented repeatedly. First of all, they suggested the best leadership, interest in people, promotion regardless of reality, focus on one goal, continuous training, and technology utilization.

I applied this principle while establishing Melvin University. In the first, I turned the wheel of establishing Melvin University three or four times by myself, but soon after several people joined and turned it together, and at some point, as if it were an automatic turn, I arrived at the end of the school without difficulty. How important repetition is, and when the circle of repetition continues to be turned, energy is generated and the elasticity of the wheel is used to achieve the desired goal. The word momentum is created when many moments are gathered, so if you continue without stopping, energy is accumulated.

For example, it is important to continuously repeat several keywords, several major strategies, or several major values in any ministry. While mastery is not achieved, not only energy accumulation and know-how development, but also resilience are increasingly attached, so that you can achieve small things at first and then do bigger things in that way.

In my personal experience, leadership, vision, focus and concentration, data development, new knowledge acquisition, etc. will be the main factors. If you keep doing this, you will eventually become a big energy and overcome your limitations if you continue with the image of turning a big wheel.

Our task is whether to complete the training in the local church in a straight line to receive and finish the course, or to release energy and create synergy when the time comes, reminiscent of the image of spinning the training content and process.

Long-term ministry will require a large wheel that includes several, and short-term ministry will require a wheel that is concentrated in three or four. Small ministries will include several elements and fewer people will be mobilized, but this wheel image will be the same.

Repeating the same thing in a wheel image is an absolute necessity of a leader's good leadership. Non-leaders may first wonder "What's wrong with him?" but after some time, they eventually understand why. Perhaps the responsibility for success lies with the leader.